Canada: Inflation picks up in September
By Matthieu Arseneau and Alexandra Ducharme

September’s inflation data was disappointing. After some respite in August, price growth picked up in September. Economists were expecting gasoline prices to fall but did not foresee the dramatic jump in food prices. Let’s hope that rumors of limited price increases from major grocery chains in the short term will contribute to calm down this critical expenditure for Canadians. Housing was also a major contributor to price increases this month, with mortgage interest cost rising by 2.8%, the largest increase since 1971 (left chart). Since the central bank is responsible for this development, it is interesting to note that this component increased monthly headline inflation by roughly 0.1%. Nevertheless, gains were widespread in September as evidenced by CPI-Median and CPI-Trim increasing 0.27% and 0.35%, a pace that, when annualized, is above the Bank of Canada’s target range. However, one should not be overly influenced by the volatile monthly movements and perhaps look at the recent trend which remains encouraging for the BoC. Back in July, the Bank’s expectations for headline annual inflation in Q3 were of 8.0%, 8 ticks higher than the actual figure (7.2%). There is also a downside risk to the 2.0% annualized growth the central bank expected for the quarter, given how the economy has evolved since then. Positive developments on the inflation front and the significant moderation in the pace of the economy suggest less acute price pressures in the coming months, meaning that coming monetary tightening could be less aggressive than it will be south of the border. We are seeing significant divergences in core inflation between Canada and the U.S. over the past 3 months, as it has moderated substantially on this side of the border (right chart). In both cases, the global slowdown, less acute supply chain issues and lower transportation costs should translate into weak goods inflation prints going into 2023.

HIGHLIGHTS:

- Canada’s consumer price index increased 0.1% in September, above consensus expectations calling for a –0.1% print (not seasonally adjusted). This comes after a 0.3% drop the prior month.
- In seasonally adjusted terms, headline prices were up 0.4%. Higher prices for food (+1.2%), shelter (+0.5%), household operations (+0.4%), healthcare (+0.3%) and recreation/reading (+0.1%) were only partially offset by declines for transportation (–0.4%). Clothing/shoe prices were flat.
- Year on year, headline inflation weakened from a 7.0% in August to 6.9% in September.
- Core inflation measures were as follows: 5.2% for CPI trim (unchanged from last month) and 4.7% for CPI median (also unchanged). As a result, the average of the two measures remained unchanged at 5.0. Note that the other core measure that the Bank of Canada used to track will not be reported anymore in our analysis. Governor Macklem said in a recent speech that the Bank would henceforth focus on the more robust CPI Trim and CPI Median. We salute the central bank’s decision to follow the recommendation of our special report of last July in which we identified issues of concern.
