

Best year since 2011

Real GDP (Q4)

Latest: +1.7% (actual); +2.0% (expected);

Previous: +1.5% (revised from +1.7%)

FACTS: Canada's GDP expanded at an annualized pace of just 1.7% in the fourth quarter last year (top chart). But because of a very strong first half – growth was actually revised up in both Q1 and Q2 –, 2017 real GDP growth ended up at 3.0%, the best annual performance in six years. Coming back to Q4, trade was an expected drag on growth as imports rose faster than exports. But domestic demand provided more than an offset thanks to gains for consumption, government spending, business investment and residential construction. Consumption found support from solid gains in real disposable incomes which offset the impact of a rising savings rate (middle chart). Nominal GDP surged 6.5% annualized, leaving 2017 growth at 5.4%, the highest in six years. Industry data showed output rising 0.1% December as gains for services-producing industries offset a small decline for goods output. For 2017 as a whole, industry data showed a 3.3% increase in output, which further widened the gap with expenditure data (bottom chart).

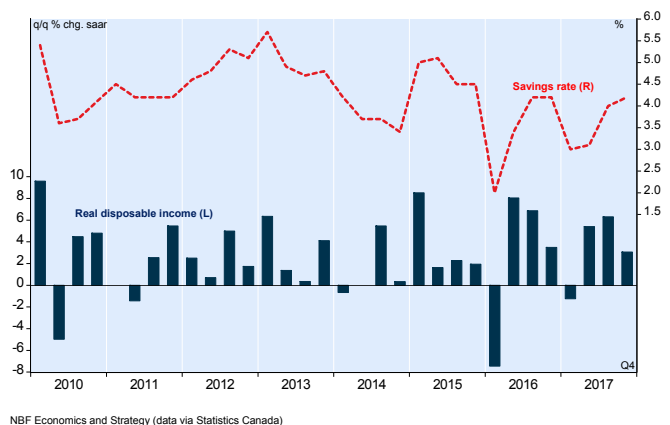

OPINION: While Q4 GDP growth was weaker than expected, the result has to be looked at in context. The white hot pace of growth seen in the first half of the year was never sustainable and hence a climb down in H2 should not be surprising. It's also worth noting the drag from inventories in Q4, which bodes well for production in early 2018. All in all, Canada had a great year in 2017 with a 3% growth print, the best since 2011. Real final domestic demand also grew 3% last year, the best performance since 2010. Another good year is in the cards for domestic demand. While consumers won't replicate last year's 3.5% increase in real spending, they will nonetheless find support from higher wages (courtesy of a tight labour market). The recovery of business investment spending is likely to continue amidst an improving outlook for corporate profits and reported interest to expand capital expenditures. Increased fiscal stimulus, made possible by the large increase in nominal GDP in 2017, will also be supportive of domestic demand. The outlook for exporters, however, remains unclear considering the apparent tilt towards protectionism in the U.S., although deals such as CETA and CPTPP warrant some optimism about export growth to non-U.S. trade partners. All in all, we remain comfortable with our above-consensus view that Canadian real GDP growth will be around 2.6% this year.
