

Quick Hit – Putting a fiscal spin on Canada’s stronger growth outlook

When it comes to budgeting, timing it seems, is everything. After all, a government has to lock-in forecasts for real economic growth, inflation, employment, interest and exchange rates at some point, and when the economic reality ends up deviating from official planning assumptions, a government’s fiscal fortunes often go with it.

Fortunately, Canadian data have tended to surprise in all the right ways since federal-provincial budgets were presented earlier this year. Indeed, since early February—when New Brunswick kicked off the 2017 budget season—no major country or economic region has enjoyed as positive a string of economic surprises as Canada. That includes a shocking number of net new jobs, including an outsized 77,000 full-time positions added on Friday (for the reference month of May). The brighter backdrop extends to national GDP growth, where the consensus forecast has stepped up more than a few times. (Note that fiscal planning assumptions—which largely embody private sector thinking—need to be captured well before a budget is formally presented. Thus, official budgetary assumptions are even staler than what might be inferred from Chart 1.)

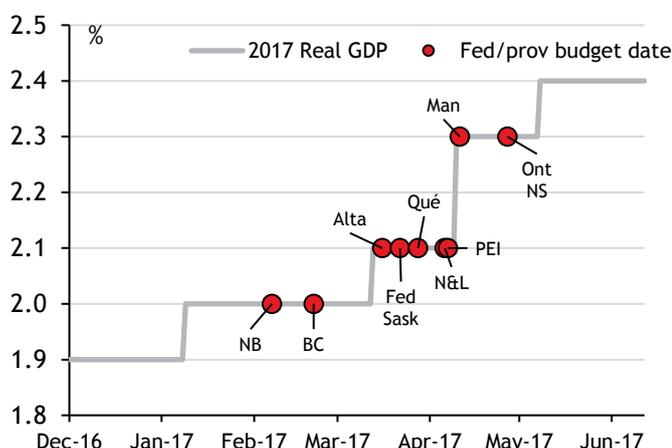

What does Canada’s stronger economy mean for our country’s public finances? More revenue for one. Employing official fiscal sensitivities, today’s firmer GDP growth outlook could bestow upon the federal government an extra $3½ billion in fiscal 2017-18, all else equal. The net improvement to Ottawa’s underlying budget balance could reach $5 billion/year come 2019-20. Those fiscal adjustments control for a back-up in interest rates (including the growing likelihood of near-term BoC tightening), which would be expected to go hand-in-hand with steamier growth and an evaporating output gap. Think of this as fiscal gravy, in that it’s incremental to the $3 billion/year the federal government already has set aside in an “adjustment for risk” (Chart 2).

What to do with this extra fiscal wiggle room? There are some immediate pressures to be sure, including disaster financial assistance related to Ontario/Québec flooding and support for a Canadian lumber industry recently hit with US duties to name two topical examples. There are longer-term priorities of the strategic variety too, such as the enhanced military capability required of today’s new world order (read: reduced reliance on the US military umbrella). If you saw the details around this last week, you’ll know that boosting our nation’s military capability in any meaningful way takes loads of money over many, many years. It’s admittedly a bit early for pre-election goodies, given that the next federal election isn’t scheduled until October 2019, but one could well imagine Bill Morneau fielding any number of funding requests from his Cabinet colleagues. The point is, there’s no shortage of spending priorities, alongside a potential need to adjust our tax rates to ensure global competitiveness. Meanwhile, one need appreciate that it’s still quite early in the fiscal year. There’s still ample uncertainty attached to the economic outlook. Oil remains a bit of a problem and one could rhyme off a host of additional risk factors at home (e.g., overheated housing) or abroad (e.g., Trump policy uncertainty) which argue for continued prudence. What’s gone up—job creation and GDP growth—could well come down.

For now, however, Canada’s surprisingly robust expansion gives the federal government greater latitude to meet/beat official budget targets or combat economic dangers than was envisioned only three months ago. And that’s not a bad place to be.
