

U.S. Watch

By Jocelyn Paquet

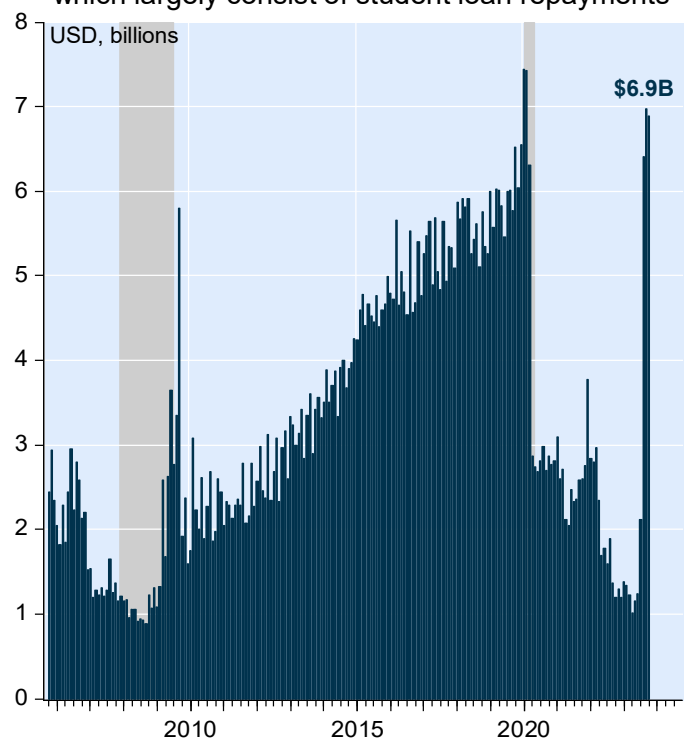

The U.S. GDP data released just under two weeks ago were truly impressive, with the economy growing by no less than 4.9% annualized in the third quarter, boosted by a significant increase in household spending. In fact, the data was so strong that many analysts began to doubt that the Federal Reserve had done enough to bring supply and demand back into better balance. But while recognizing the economy's amazing resilience in the face of aggressive monetary tightening by the central bank, our group did express some reservations about the sustainability of consumption spending. Our doubts stemmed in large part from the fact that rising household spending in Q3 had not been accompanied by a corollary increase in disposable income but was rather the result of a significant drop in the savings rate (which is counterintuitive in a world of higher interest rates). We felt consumers had been incentivized to spend beyond their means by cultural phenomena such as the Taylor Swift and Beyonce concert tours and the Hollywood blockbusters Barbie and Oppenheimer. As such, we feared that the burst of vigor would be short-lived. Data published today by the New York Fed (in partnership with Equifax) seemed to corroborate this view, pointing to consumers' growing difficulty in servicing their debts. As today's Hot Chart shows, the percentage of outstanding credit card and auto loans transitioning into serious delinquency (90+ days) indeed rose to a 12- and 13-year high, respectively, in Q3. In the case of credit cards, the increase in delinquency rates from one quarter to the next was even the largest recorded to date. And with interest rates having continued to rise on average in Q4, another increase in the last three months of the year looks inevitable, especially as payments on student debt have now resumed. To be sure, these payments are now back to their pre-pandemic level (around $7 billion per month) according to data published by the U.S. Treasury, a development that is likely to squeeze consumers further. For these reasons, we continue to expect a marked slowdown in consumption - and hence GDP growth - in the fourth quarter. The latter should settle at around 1.0%/1.5% annualized before slowing further in early 2024.

U.S.: Have consumers overstretched themselves?

Percentage of credit card/auto loans transitioning into serious delinquency (90+ days), all age groups

Monthly cash deposits into the Treasury General Fund from Education Department programs, which largely consist of student loan repayments
