

The foreign footprint in Canada's bond market

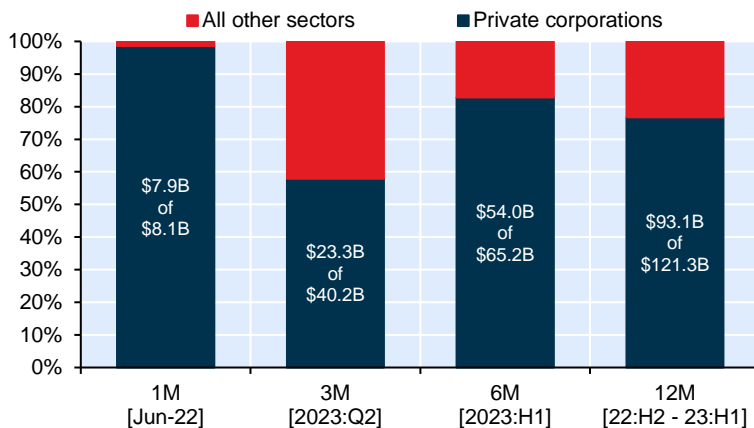

By Warren Lovely & Taylor Schleich

It would be hard to miss the growing scrutiny of/concern surrounding the offloading of U.S. Treasuries by certain large foreign investors, this reported net selling seemingly contributing (along with a sovereign credit rating downgrade, hefty supply projections and economic resilience) to a noted back-up in longer-term bond yields south of the border. It's against this somewhat anxious backdrop that StatCan treated us to the latest monthly installment of Canada's international transactions in securities (for the month of June). What do we make of the latest data on foreign flows in Canadian debt? Plenty...

First off, non-residents continued to pile into GoC T-bills in June, pushing the 3-month T-bill buying binge beyond $20 billion (three quarters of net bill issuance over that time). Not for nothing, the growing foreign appetite for Canada's yield-ier short-term paper has coincided with an enlarged federal T-bill program, the stock of outstanding bills having already hit the 2023-24 target set out in Ottawa's latest DMS (with more than half the fiscal year yet to go). Elsewhere, June data seemed to reveal solid foreign buying of 'Canadian' bonds. The sector split showed the vast majority of net foreign buying of Canadian bonds was steered to private corporations as opposed to the public sector. Before you start thinking foreign investors are invading the domestic corporate bond market en masse, note that sector-specific bond tallies include securities denominated in all currencies... not just CAD-denominated paper. Much of the so-called 'Canadian' corporate debt non-residents have accumulated was printed south of the border or overseas. Indeed, the breakdown of foreign flows by currency of issue confirmed net selling of CAD-denominated bonds in June. Gasp!?! Hold up, June is a very special month in Canada's bond market, owing to its clustering of maturities/coupons. It makes June a seasonal weak spot when it comes to net foreign flows. If anything, the $1.8 billion net reduction in foreign holdings of CAD-denominated bonds this June was pretty modest vs. the 10 yards that typically comes out that month. Looking beyond monthly oscillations, foreign holdings of GoC bonds have structurally grown. Fun fact: As of June, non-residents were back to owning more Canadas than the central bank, foreign investor attachment contributing to the orderly re-allocation of Canada's sovereign paper that is required in the BoC's ongoing QT regime. Lest you think we're far too in thrall of admittedly stale data (StatCan's report is for June after all), we're not seeing/sensing any serious international selling of Canadian bonds of late. That's more a problem for Treasuries.
