

[Before you ask] September 8th & 15th coups/rolls not as much of a 'thing'

By Warren Lovely

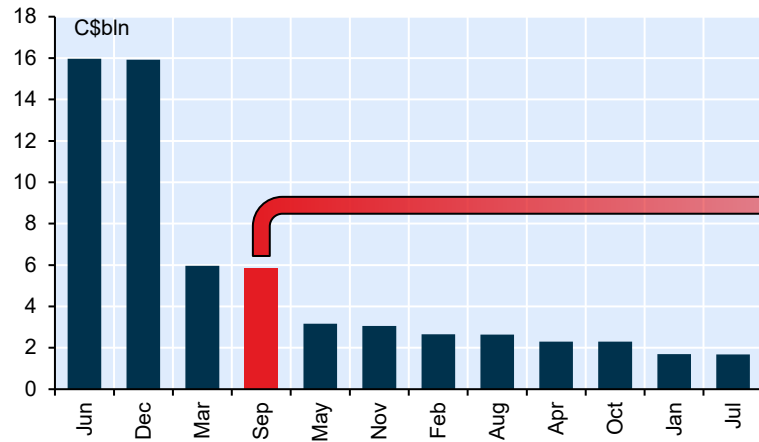

In recent days, we've penned two notes on the outside coupon payments, bond index rolls and resulting duration extension teed up for Friday, September 1st (refer to those notes here and here). The sizeable September 1st index/portfolio adjustments are but a day away. Now before you ask, 'yes' there will be other non-trivial cash flows this September above and beyond the first of the month (Charts 1-2). For instance, September 8th is a notable maturity date for the largest provincial bond issuer (Ontario), while a September 15th (and March 15th) maturity dating has been commonly used for CMBs (although more so for floaters). We don't wish to minimize any given day's index adjustments and necessary portfolio tweaks, but the simple fact is September 8th and September 15th typically don't move the bond index dial like September 1st.

As previously explored, much of the September 1st extension we see coming for all major buckets of the FTSE Canada Universe Bond Index can be traced to the rolling out or rolling over of a handful of chunky bonds. A detailed look reveals that Universe inclusivity and/or bucket status of nine specific securities will change on the first, where combined holdings approach $50 billion (2.5% of the Universe). The single biggest roll on September 1st is a Sep-28 GoC bond. Nonetheless, a variety of Quebec-based issues (provincial + municipal) will also roll on the first.

By comparison, only two Universe bonds are currently due to roll on September 8th, both issued by Ontario (Chart 3). One of those bonds ($3.5 billion) rolls out of the index, while the other ($1 billion) rolls down from the 'mid' to 'short' bucket. As for September 15th, not a single index-eligible fixed-rate bond rolls. It follows that the simulated change in the duration of the FTSE Canada Universe Bond Index isn't all that significant on the 8th and is downright negligible for the 15th (Chart 4). Note: Impacts related to the ~$35 billion of outstanding CMB FRNs are not factored in here, as these floaters are not included in Universe. Two final words of caution: ceteris paribus. The simulated changes in index duration presented here are based on existing bond constituents/pricing and assume no change in the yield curve. Obviously, that's a simplifying assumption. After all, September 8th comes in the wake of a BoC policy rate decision, while September 15th straddles closely watched U.S. and Canadian CPI reports. Much can and will change, but on their face, September 8th and 15th are more minor events vs. September 1st.

Chart 1: September cash an understandable focal point

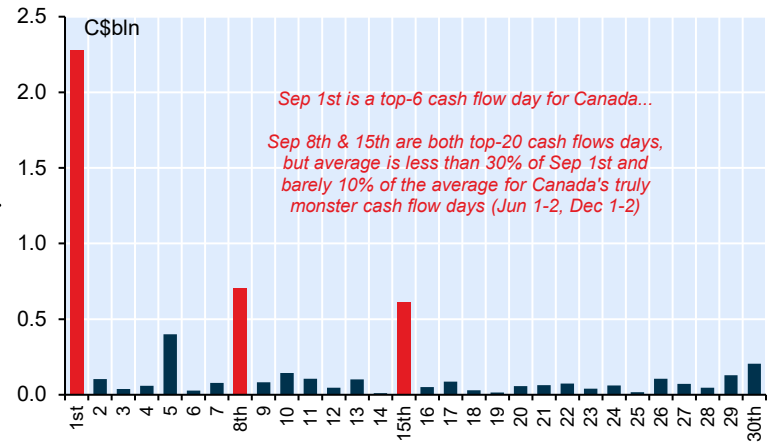

Monthly FTSE Canada Universe Bond Index interest income: Coming 12 months
