

Canada's 'demographic recession' changes the macro math

By Taylor Schleich & Daren King

This morning, StatCan reported that Canada's population fell for a third straight quarter as of April 1st. The national headcount is now down 0.5% from a year ago, but this 'demographic recession' is geographically uneven. Enduring the sharpest population declines are Ontario and B.C., due to a heavy concentration of temporary residents. Meanwhile, some regions are still growing, led by Alberta—up nearly 1% Y/Y. Nationally, this is all part of Ottawa's plan to "restore balance and control" to the immigration system (for which serious progress is being made, as we explore in a forthcoming Hot Chart) and will prove temporary in the fullness of time. Still, current dynamics have implications across the economy, which matters for Canada's macro math and the BoC outlook.

Growth is stronger than it appears: A falling population was but one reason to push back on the 'technical recession' narrative that took hold last month. Indeed, on a per capita basis, GDP growth has been positive, including a near-1% expansion in Q1. Another reason to fade the recession rhetoric? Q2 growth is set to be robust and could see per capita GDP expand by nearly 3%—the fastest rate of growth since 2022.

Chart 3: 'Breakeven job growth' is close to zero

Breakeven job growth vs. actual job growth (6-month moving average)

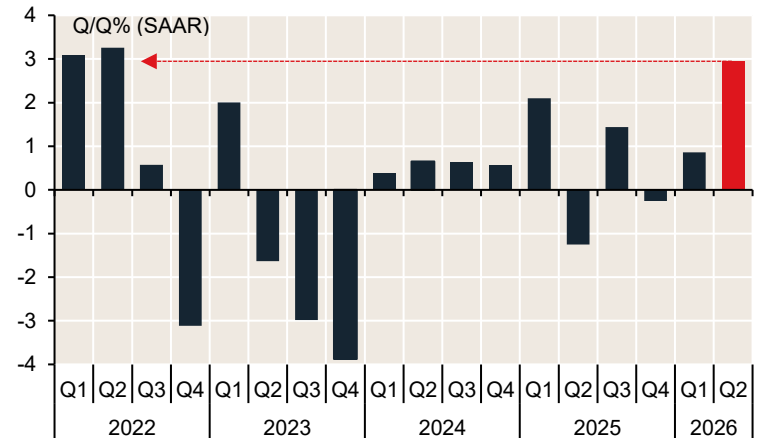

Source: NBC, StatCan | Note: Breakeven = job growth needed to keep unemployment rate unchanged, assuming unchanged participation from prior month.

The hiring bar is low(er): Fewer residents mean fewer potential workers so flat monthly job readings no longer deserve an immediate negative assessment. Based on the latest Labour Force Survey, breakeven job growth (the pace of hiring needed to keep the unemployment rate steady) is below 10K. This helps explain why sluggish hiring over the past year has not pushed the unemployment rate higher (in addition to changes in participation). To be sure, flatlining employment is nothing to get excited about, but it does mean that job market slack has stopped accumulating.

Immigration relief → inflation relief: Stronger per capita GDP growth may appear consistent with lingering market expectations for rate hikes this fall, but a declining population is also disinflationary. House prices continue to edge lower (see our analysis this morning) with less structural demand. Asking rents are also down, and this has yet to fully show up in the CPI. It means more core inflation relief is coming and that the odds of a quick pivot to tighter monetary policy are low (as trade uncertainty continues to weigh, arguing for policy rate patience).
